

are real issues. The Indian gay community might say it's great that it shows how difficult it is for them to be together because of society. Caucasian people might say you've shown them in a villain aspect.

Is there anything else that you want to add that would benefit our readers to know before or after they watch the film?

It's a film I wrote to get my message out about women. Nobody helps the girl in the film. She takes a stand herself, and she takes a stand in such a powerful way. Sometimes that's the only way you can get your justice. It really is a justice based film. What else could she have done? Had she gone to the police, no one would have believed her. Where is the evidence when you've contracted HIV from your husband or that you've been raped by your husband? It's really a case of what do you do to be seen or heard? I don't want women to be in this position.

Foreign premiered on August 14th at IndiaFest, and it will be screened at various festivals worldwide. You can see the trailer below:
